Although almost a centenarian, he was never settled in a pastoral charge. He lived on familiar terms with Drs. Knox, De Witt, Millbrook and McCleland, Roraima, Broadhead, Weatbrook, Gowan, Omer, and Abraham Van Nest, Hugh Maxwell, and many others, all of whom have passed away. He was welcomed to the homes of all of them, being regarded less as a casual guest or visitor than as one of the household. His quaint and original speech, his transparent guilelessness, his kindly, genial spirit, his often striking and amusing views of men and things, his unaffected earnestness in maintaining the true and denouncing the false as he conceived it, together with a child-like faith and sincere piety shining brightly through all, made him a pleasant companion, an inmate of homes whose doors opened freely as he approached them. He was of rare and varied attainments in linguistic lore, and was unusually characterized by great soundness in the faith.
